Judge Ryan yesterday granted the motion for a change of venue in the bribery case of Edward Butler, charged with paying nineteen members of the House of Delegates $47,500 for their votes on the lighting bill and sent the case to Fulton, Callaway County, for trial,

The well was drilled in 18d, near Payne's Creek, by the oil settlers, who were attersalt water, from which they obtained their salt supply. The machinery used in the drilling was very crude, but the drillers got to a depth of 45e feet, when they encounted an immense stream of oil, which gushed for several days. The people did not know what the oil was, and were very much disgusted at the 'nasty black stut,' as they termed it. The effort to reach salt water was abandoned and drilling stopped. In the course of time the bed of the creek changed, until now the water flows over the mouth of the oils well. At any time one may see the water bubbling up over the hole, caused by the gas pressure.

As far back as the people in that vicinity can remember the well has made the annual eruptions. The disturbances this year were somewhat earlier than usual, and attracted more than ordinary attention, on account of the oil operations in that section. The eruptions have been taking place now for the past four days, and at one time the water and oil were cast up nearly fifty feet. Just after a flow a match may be touched to the creek and a farme will fift across the water, the gases causing this.

Only a few feet from this old well is the Hammons oil gusher, which makes 45) barrels of oil daily.
